They ruin lives, families, and communities. They operate on the basis of intimidation, elimination of competition, reputation, and profit motives. Sum of The Amount dealers can make a surprise. The way they continue to operate and sell their poison that kills individuals and communities is that good people do nothing. If you realize someone is selling drugs in your area, consider doing what you can to stop them by bringing them to the attention of law enforcement. Don't just ignore it, and pretend you didn't see it, or hope it will disappear. Types of Drug Dealers There are different types of drug dealers, based on how many products (drugs) they move, and their motives. The description below is a general category, which not all individuals fit neatly. Traders are addicts who sell small amounts of drugs to other users to fund and support their own habits. They can also trade one drug for another. They make a few dollars here and there, but dealing with drugs is not their main source of income. They will also work and collect various forms of public assistance to generate revenue. Street dealers. When most people think of drug dealers, this is the kind they have in mind. They sell drugs to users. They can make hundreds or thousands of dollars in a few hours, depending on their location, reputation, product quality and customer base. They tend to be armed, and can quickly use force if they feel threatened or challenged. Most have extensive criminal history. The main or only source of income is the sale of drugs. Suppliers or Kingpins buy very large quantities of drugs, cut drugs with inert ingredients to maximize weight and volume, which maximize profits, and sell to street dealers. They can make tens of thousands to hundreds of thousands of dollars - a month. They tend to work as part of a criminal organization, and chew drugs are the main or only source of income. They will almost certainly be armed, and have an armed layer of security. Baron supplies suppliers. They produce drugs, process raw materials into drugs, grow large volumes of marijuana, cocoa leaves, or poppies, and can produce millions or tens or hundreds of millions a year. They are highly professional surrounded by layers of security, including bribed officials, and may operate outside the continental United States. They are considered untouchable. Bringing down the barons was a huge under end, involving years of investigation and planning, and infiltration by undercover law enforcement, and establishing a CI (Confidential Informant). It typically involves a multi-jurisdictional task force of federal and international law enforcement agencies and investments of a lot of money, time and very high risk. Ordinary civilians are unlikely to have contact with them, or would seem to be a legitimate businessman. They are best given a wide berth. Also: Intermediaries or brokers place dealers, and suppliers and users relate to each other. Couriers or Mules transport drugs, often across state or international borders. Amateurs, aka One-time Civilians aka generally legal laws responsible members of their community. They decided they would move large amounts of the drug only once, making considerable profits, to pay off the mortgage, buy a new car, arrange a pension, or any other large business, and go to a deal with no intention of repeating it. They may keep this promise, or very similar to the idea of making large amounts of cash for a single transaction, without the obligation to pay taxes. They might do it one more time over the years. They often don't have a criminal mindset, and can make big mistakes. They put their families at risk, and are not trusted by professional criminals because they will quickly accept the deal and change the CI. Although they will also be in grave danger by doing so due to their amateur status. They are not trusted due to a lack of criminal pedigree and can be subject to intense scrutiny. These reasons are also why professional dealers work with them; they are often beyond the suspicion of law enforcement, and have access to contacts and funds to move drugs without attracting attention. Law Enforcement Strategies To Catch Drug Dealers Law enforcement strategy is a erring. Law enforcement has little interest in street level dealers, and is hardly interested in Merchants. They want suppliers. By catching suppliers, local drug supplies will dry up when dealers sell all the products they hold, and have no source to replenish their supply, in this way; drug trafficking in certain geographic areas can be paralyzed. Unfortunately, this is an ongoing activity. New suppliers will soon move to market voids created by supplier arrests, and start moving their drugs to street-level dealers. A new investigation will begin, and the process will begin again. For the purposes of exiting, we will define drug dealers as suppliers. What to look for Someone who roams the public area, with a few people approaching them for just a few minutes or less. They'll take something off the ground, drop something, exchange a handshake or a high five as drugs and cash are legalized. Many people come and go from residences or buildings, but only stay for a few minutes. Someone drives a very expensive car, wears designer label clothes and jewelry, flashes wads of cash, but they stay in trailers or cheap apartments or get out of hotels. Unreasonable reason to bring a lot of cash I win big on the race track Conclusion drug dealers can be very serious and very dangerous individuals. You should consider the risks involved by making reports that may or may not remain anonymous. But the benefits of putting dealers out of commission accountability, public safety and saving the lives of addicts. Drug abuse of any kind can wreak havoc on individuals and family members. Determining whether to report drug abuse or whether to help addicted individuals in seeking drug rehabilitation services can be difficult to make. Law enforcement agencies primarily focus on drug sellers or pharmacies operating in the sale of illegal prescription drugs. If you know of a pharmacy or individual who sells drugs, report it to your local police or to the DEA. Educate yourself for the signs and symptoms of drug abuse. If you suspect someone is abusing drugs, pay attention to common signs, such as eye bloodshed, unexplained changes in sleep or productivity, abnormal hyperactivity, lack of motivation, and frequent financial difficulties. Research drug treatment options. If you're worried about a family member or friend, your best option might be to talk directly to him or her about the help available. Talk to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration or contact your local Narcotics Anonymous group. These groups can talk to you about your concerns and refer you to available treatments. Contact the DEA Prescription Drug Abuse Hotline if you suspect a pharmacy or doctor is over-prescribing or selling illegal prescription drugs. You can create a report to the hotline anonymously. Call your local police if you suspect someone is selling drugs. You must provide information about what you have seen, the location of the sale, and any information you have about whether the individual has a weapon. You can request that your report be anonymous, although you may be asked to serve as a witness if an arrest is made. Report individuals with substance abuse problems to the police. Possession of illegal drugs is a crime. However, police may or may not arrest the individual. Usually they will need additional evidence, such as finding paraphernalia in someone, to pursue a case. In most cases, if a loved one is abusing drugs, your best option is to talk to him or her about the problem and offer as much help as you can provide. Give.
